Review of new evidence of the underlying mechanisms leading to the regression of prostate cancer. Clinical observations have shown that approximately 50% of prostate cancer cases can spontaneously regress, and currently no information is available on the causes of the regression. We review several aspects of this problem with special emphasis on the molecular and biochemical changes leading to the regression of prostate cancer and on the possible implications for clinical practice. While it is known that the loss of androgen-dependent growth leads to regression, the molecular and biochemical changes that occur during regression remain unknown. Most of the molecular changes, which generally occur in the disease context of advanced androgen-independent tumors, could be associated with apoptosis, which occurs in the majority of cases at an early stage of the regression, often with a co-existing increase in the activity of specific antioxidant enzymes. Several of these changes, such as the increased activity of antioxidant enzymes (particularly catalase), could be potentially useful in selecting cancer patients that are most likely to respond to androgen deprivation or chemotherapy. Epidermal growth factor receptor (EGFR) is the most frequently mutated oncogene in lung cancer; we previously reported that mutation of EGFR affected the expression of gap junctions, a type of intercellular connection termed gap junction plaques. In the present study, we examined whether or not alteration of EGFR expression alters the expression of gap junction plaques in lung carcinoma cells. The cell line that had mutation of EGFR was derived from human lung adenocarcinoma cell line, PC-9. The expression of intercellular molecules was examined by indirect immunofluorescence using the following antibodies: anti-connexin 37, 39, 43, 45, 46, and 50. Connexin 43 expression was most strongly decreased by alteration of EGFR expression compared with connexin 37 and connexin 45 expression. Intercellular connections were examined by confocal laser scanning microscopy. The intercellular connections included membrane tubules and vesicles, which are termed vesicular intercellular connections. The proportion of vesicular connections decreased in the cells expressing mutant EGFR. From these results, we conclude that EGFR up-regulation decreases the expression of connexin 43 and the proportion of vesicular connections, suggesting that genetic alteration of EGFR affects gap junction formation in lung cancer cells. that an average of 14.8% of the patients in the placebo group (*n* = 15) would require anticholinergic medication per day to manage OAB. Thirty-six percent of patients on oxybutynin had daily anticholinergic medication requirements. Discussion {#Sec4} ===== The present study is the largest, randomized and placebo-controlled trial to demonstrate superiority of oxybutynin SR to 3e33713323
