That can happen in one of two ways: either the compositor looks for an M3U8 playlist, and a DASH stream is presented to it (e.g. within one player), or an HLS stream is presented. When it finds a playlist, it renders the player for that playlist. HLS playback should be transparent to the compositor (e.g. we'll use the RGBContainer and RGBContainerStack nodes to handle that transition), but a DASH feed will automatically be rendered using HLS. DASH wouldn't normally be used in a world that allowed public playlists (i.e. one playlist per channel), but that's exactly what we have now. For the sake of simplicity, let's assign each player on Planet working their own instance of an RGBContainer (I added an ID field to the nodes, shown below): This is a bit of a hack (not unusual for me), but it's the simplest solution to this problem. Both types of DASH streams are handled by the RGBContainer, so the UUIDs can be defined once and we can then instantiate them all. I added a couple more nodes to handle the media (a media node and a RenderContext node) and handle switching between them on the fly. Here's the result: We're still missing something, though: we can't select a DASH player. To do that, we'll add one last node, a DASHPlayer node with one property, enable (boolean). This will look for a DASH request. Here's the result: There's a lot of config file stuff in there, so here's a link to my repository. We're getting close! Wrapping up I think that's it. I have some other minor things I want to do before the next release (mostly related to the GL API), and I've got a few things to research and maybe implement. I've also submitted a merge request so that the headless JS library can start getting used by the Chromecast itself. As usual, I welcome your thoughts, as well as pull requests if
