Logoism: Contemporary Logo Design.logoism: Contemporary Logo Design.logoism: Contemporary Logo Design.epubBANGKOK -- Thai anti-government protesters have been given suspended jail sentences of nearly three years each, as their uprising begins to settle down with an amnesty law and a revamped constitution. More than 9,000 people were arrested in a sweep by security forces after anti-government protesters stormed the parliament buildings in Bangkok last May. By early this year, about 2,000 of them had been convicted and sentenced to prison for between three and eight years, as the junta tightened its grip on the nation. The remaining cases were heard late last month with the maximum sentences of three years upheld in some cases while suspended in others. It was the first time in years that an amnesty law, the Council for National Security Bill, has been enacted in late 2012 to come out of jail for lack of evidence and file for amnesty. Other protesters who have accepted a suspended jail sentence will also gives amnesty law, the Council for National Security Bill, has been enacted in late 2012 to come out of jail for lack of evidence and file for amnesty.
