I have working environment of an existing Mercurial repository that uses Hudson as a CI platform. This repository currently has 2 branches in it: master and beta When I am on the master branch, I am calling p4 rename [-oldname] [-newname] to rename files. I want to add another branch in my development environment. I have called a new branch from old branch using command: hg branch -b beta Then added a folder for this beta branch into this new folder. Now I want to rename this beta folder from old folder name to new folder name. If I am on master branch, I will execute: p4 rename -oldname=old-folder name -newname=new-folder name But when I am on beta branch, I want to rename the folder to new folder name and not the old name. Is there any way to handle this scenario with hg? Thanks A: There is nothing in hg (as of 2012) to do this. The closest is hg rename. As is well known in the art, magnets are used to attract ferromagnetic materials including metals and iron, magnetically susceptible material including iron and steel, and ferrous and ferric alloys. Usually, the magnetic force between the magnets is utilized for the purpose of positioning, positioning a magnetic particle, holding a magnetic particle, drawing a magnetic particle from a fluid, and clamping, clamping a ferromagnetic surface. It is also well known that a single cylindrical permanent magnet, for example, a bar magnet, can be used to attract a magnetic particle. Bar magnets are made of a length of rod of magnetized material, usually steel, with a bore through which a substance can be injected or pumped. The bore defines a central discharge port through which the ejected substance exits

College of Arts and Sciences Dean Robert Jones fired William Bowen last week after the department brass concluded he had solicited and charged "excessive" fees from the department for editing the book of the now-deceased inventor of the violin bow. The case reignited national questions about academic freedom at a university that is known for its research prowess and strict intellectual policies. Bowen's lawyer, Thomas Burke, said Bowen had a contractual relationship with the department and that the college had kicked him out of its office when it had enough. "Bowen was working pro bono for the department, which includes the public service of the brand and marketing of the department. For that reason alone, Bowen was terminated," Burke said. Bowen may have used his academic connections to hawk the book, but the university has paid him $1.75 million to settle a claim by Harvey Militeit, the professor who fired is considered the book's co-author. Militeit alleged that Bowen helped the department with a marketing plan for the book as part of a "confidential agreement" in 2011, when the company — called Project Pursuit — had its paid director of marketing, Bowen, submit creative work to the class's professor. Bowen is currently on leave, but he's not on the faculty and the deal was never actually published, but billed as "Project Pursuit Marketing Services" and for services rendered, Militeit said. Jones told The Post the university will consider "students' academic freedom issues" when it sets up a committee to investigate the matter. University spokesman Tom Conroy said the school isn't "concerned about compromising on academic freedom" and that Bowen isn�
