Google Reader is a desktop service that collects news feeds from all of the RSS services that are supported by its company. When you subscribe to a specific RSS feed, Google Reader notifies you when there's a new article on that feed. You can browse the news feeds in Google Reader and see all of the articles in them. Google Reader also supports subscriptions to specific news services, like FeedBurner, so you don't have to wait for a service to go down before you know that it's dead. According to a recent blog post by Jillian York, associate director of the Center for Democracy and Technology (CDT), Google is changing its position on the non-profit Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) that tried to stop the removal of RSS services from Google Reader. "Google has announced that it has reversed its decision to make Google Reader part of the Google Toolbar and will keep Google Reader as a standalone application," York said. The decision doesn't mean that Google Reader users will have access to their feeds on Google's search engine or Google's Chrome browser. York said that users could get around the problem by using RSS viewing apps, such as FeedDemon, and access their feeds through their browsers. "The changes do not make Google Reader part of Google search or Google's browser," York added. York said that her organization understands Google's motivations. "We understand why Google wants to make Google Reader part of its Web applications so that Google can drive people to its content," she said. "But we don't think that the decision is in the best interests of users. We believe that other browsers and RSS readers should be able to integrate with Google
