David Koch, the eccentric billionaire heir to the Koch fortune, is urging the libertarian-leaning billionaire organization Freedom Partners and its donors to redirect their political giving to fellow conservative supporters in November's midterm elections. Relying on stealth fund-raising tactics, the oil and gas tycoon is circulating a personal appeal on which wealthy donors are encouraged to donate to like-minded candidates rather than Republican incumbents who are endangered in their re-election bids. "What if the loss of our most recent opportunity to elect good conservative leaders in the Senate and/or in the House means the nation is forced to head down a disastrous path?" reads a memo that Koch operatives sent to donors and other strategists at Freedom Partners. "Something has to be done before it's too late." In the call for action, Koch called for the transfer of "generous" contributions made in previous months to some of the midterm races in which Republican incumbents are being challenged. It's a reminder of the fund-raising efforts of Koch and his brother Charles in previous election cycles. Although David Koch is not so much a donor as an active political player, his billionaire business empire has funneled more than $100 million to political campaigns and other activities over the years. But this is the first call for action in a midterm year during which Koch's political machine has shifted its focus to electing candidates aligned with its principles. The Koch brothers have contributed millions of dollars to Senate campaigns of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, Missouri Sen. Roy Blunt
