Some truly prime blog posts on this site, saved to bookmarks I need to get the results from page 1 in the response body of these requests, which are the names of a large number of entities. I've tried: The default Java way with DefaultHttpClient, but of course it works only on desktop clients. Calling HttpGet, then converting the response to JSON using a little tool I made. The problem is that all the entities are wrapped in object arrays, so there's no easy way to convert just the names of the entities into usable JSON. Using EasyNetWebservices, which seems promising, as it has a feature to get JSON out of the response (see documentation here). The problem is that it's very simple and doesn't provide a way to get JSON out of all responses, it only for some specific GET requests. A: It sounds like you want to make a streaming REST client. You will be better off using something like httpclient4j which supports this. I wrote about a simple example here for Java 8. You should create a class that extends httpclient4j's AbstractHttpClient and overrides the execute() method to extract the JSON data you want from the response. It would probably be easy to convert that into a factory method that can be called by the rest of your client code. You can see the class here, in a project called myrestclient. Q: I have an HTML file, each one is named like the time - example file1, file2, etc. Is there a way to generate a URL like I have an HTML file, each one is named like the time - example file1, file2, etc. Is there a way to generate a URL like A: Not exactly what you need, but this will do what you need: example.com Q: Is there a way to get the "text" attribute of a multiple select element in jQuery? I'm doing some work
