Their activation and memory are central to the host's ability to produce a rapid, appropriately targeted, and potentially sterile response to infection. Lymphocytes are also critical components of the adaptive immune system. Mice that have been immunized by subcutaneous or intravenous injection of cells engineered to express genetically modified transgenes have proven to be useful models to study the process of lymphocyte activation and induction of memory. Here we describe retroviral vectors that have been used to express green fluorescent protein (GFP) and diphtheria toxin A chain (DT) in murine lymphocytes to study their activation and memory formation in vivo. We also describe in detail the characteristics of the retroviral vector used to deliver the genes of interest into the murine lymphocytes.#!/bin/sh # # Copyright (c) 2014, 2015, Oracle and/or its affiliates.
