One of the techniques that has grown to become a consistent trend is the use of attack surfaces , which could range from vulnerability-scanning tools, including IBM X-Force IRIS, to post-exploitation modules to exploit vulnerability to gain access to users' systems and reconfigure them, in order to gain complete control. The X-Force 2019 Threat Landscape covers this in greater detail, and goes beyond vulnerabilities to include attacks against the underlying operating system , antivirus systems, websites, and even peers. The 2019 Threat Landscape also shows that malicious content in the form of phishing, exploit kits, and Command and Control (C&C) servers are also on the rise. This is primarily due to the fact that APIs have been leveraged and made available to the public. The rise of these platforms, in addition to cryptominers , make it easier for hackers to easily infect computers. The Black Hat webinars are available on YouTube . David 'romhacks' Hands is a 19-year old freelance hacker living in the UK. He has been hacking since age 15, when he started using computer tools to break into the electronics of his Game Boy, and continues to be fascinated by hacking every day. "Wanna know how to build your own X-Force robot car? Take a look at the hacked Raspberry Pi Zero W below," Hands said to a room of attendees at Black Hat. He's talking about the code the group used to control a Raspberry Pi Zero W-based robot car. Ars Technica is where the future of tech journalism is being written.
