This is what's been crucial in preparing for making Wild Hunt. We've gathered a lot of ideas and this time around, we've brought in the most talented and experienced talent from our studio, to start making the game. So, working with these guys, it's fun. We're very excited. We're not just throwing a bunch of ideas together and going, "Oh, let's just do this." We're really thinking about it, and this time, about the game from scratch and what we want to do. And it's cool! It may be that the game needs to be buffed, either in terms of content or in performance. If we do make changes, we will let you know. We will also make sure to mention the patch in the patch notes if any changes are required. Then if you want, we will update the patch for the players of the Japanese version. We don't want to promise any dates, but we will keep you posted. We've studied a lot of games that we want to make better. We've studied them to see what they do right, and also what their weaknesses are, what kind of experiences they give you. As you know, we're Witcher fans. So, we want to draw on this. We want to bring out the best of what we saw in these games, our favorite games. That will be the main inspiration. That's what will influence us the most, the player's experiences. Adam Badowski: A lot of players will start the game at the beginning and see Geralt and want to help him. There are quests you can start, for example when you first arrive in town. You can become the established hero or decide to become the "other side of the coin" -- that's another story that can be told in the game. We wanted to tell a story from the side of the hero, so that means to begin with, to start off as a more controversial character. Someone who doesn't help as much as others, but gets the job done. A more self-contained story that doesn't tie into the main narrative of the world of the Witcher. 5ec8ef588b
