the next day, the villagers are very excited, as well as the soldiers who were assigned to protect them, especially a young soldier called sid (roopesh sharma), and a local policeman named premnath (subrat dutta). premnath tells the villagers that a daily train from pakistan has arrived with sikhs and hindus from lahore, and that the next day it will arrive with sikhs from delhi. he also tells them that the refugees had left the camp, and are no longer in the area. the day of the killings arrives, and all of the villagers are afraid that the ghost train is going to arrive on time. the soldiers and villagers are on the lookout for the dacoits who took the bodies to their hideout on the nearby mountains. the principal actor is chittaranjan tripathi, who is an actor who is a natural clown. he is a comic who never gets on anyone's nerves and who always has a little leeway to exploit. chittaranjan comes across as a serious man, because he makes everything so serious. but his dialogue is funny and silly, and he is very funny as well. even though he is a clown, he really did have some talent. he was the first actor ever to play a role that was so complex and serious, and play it completely without any kind of artificial limitation. like i said earlier, the script was born purely out of budgetary restrictions as writers whannell and wan deliberately wanted to write a horror film as cheaply as possible. one that they could finance themselves. inspired by low-budget movies such as pi and the blair witch project, they decided on the concept of two actors, one room, and one dead body. easily one of the best screenplays to read for horror writers.
