Speaking of usable video editing features The new video editor features Support for Bulk Video Operations (BVFOs) and Adobe's new Content-Aware Mode. A BVFO is the ability to edit multiple videos at once, and makes it easier for users to manipulate the timeline of video while also editing various videos at the same time. The Content-Aware Mode takes a bit of time to master but it has a huge advantage: it will automatically extract out the still part of a video and treat it like a still photo instead of video. Obviously, that means that not all videos will be suitable for this particular feature (like movies). The feature is currently in beta, and not all footage will be suitable. A tool like the Clarity filter, for instance, is used to sharpen images. A rule for the Clarity filter is, to sharpen the image, make sure any regions of in-focus information are more intense than any out-of-focus information.

With the advance in technology, more and more web and mobile designers are looking to use Photoshop in their creative processes. Whether they're designers, animators, illustrators, web and mobile developers, or motion graphics artists- this software offers a frightening amount of functionality and power to any creative-minded person. Adobe is phasing out the program once older features are fully implemented into the product. For business people it probably makes sense to consider planning now how to implement new technologies. Adobe Creative Cloud will be available to new subscribers starting September 1, 2020. This subscription idea has been on the brain of designers and web developers since Adobe created Photoshop. At $9.99 per month, the subscription is a bit expensive for many new creative professionals. On the other hand, it offers a lot of benefits for the price. This product will have a long history of features. I hope the subscription model becomes a success for Adobe to bridge the product to new users with new features. Many pros already run a subscription workflow which prevents software piracy, but this removes that incentive. This may also give publishers more incentive to subsidize subscription services.
