"The Attorney General has a longstanding policy to recuse from any case where he, himself, participated in the conduct under investigation," a Justice Department spokeswoman said in a statement. "However, he fully supports the Department's decision to appoint a special counsel to oversee the Russian Federation matter." Barr spoke with Justice Department Inspector General Michael Horowitz on Friday, according to the spokeswoman, who noted that Horowitz will share his conclusions of the inquiry with Congress in a coming report. On Monday, Horowitz told lawmakers in a closed-door briefing that his team had identified more than 2,500 documents and made over 5,000 interviews in the course of its investigation into how and why the FBI opened the Trump-Russia probe. "It is very clear that the events of 2016 were controversial," he said in the meeting. "People were running for president. People were involved in campaigns." "We were unaware of who paid for the dossier, or who commissioned the dossier, or the source of that information," he said, referencing an opposition research document compiled in 2016 by a former British spy that included unverified allegations that President Donald Trump had colluded with Russia. The inspector
