A great new feature this version is the ability to fan out the selected files to all photo services (and yes, it works with Google photos too). Previously you had to do it manually/manually or imgur/imgur. Chris Ferguson has pointed out that this is also possible in CS5 and CS6 (which are still not completely fixed for fan out) but some people may be tempted to shell out for that version. It's time to say goodbye to Photoshop and move on to Lightroom. If Lightroom sells its features to you as "more features, faster processing", then you're not going to get any of the features you expected from Photoshop. If you're one of those people who doesn't need the extra features and prefers to have the speed, then I got a neat feature for you. I refer to the new "Automatic Optimize" feature ("Use this to make minor updates, such as changing cropping for a portrait or correcting the color balance in a landscape image"). It uses the command line tool to optimize the picture, issue an autosave without leaving the keyboard and never crashes. I've been using the command line tools from the Image Processor and PSE11 for years. This was, as the name suggests, a feature that I requested - nothing more. All you need to do is select a photo, hold down the Shift key for a sec and click on the Optimize button to enable this option (and save the Optimized image, of course). You probably won't find a margin where this is the best option as Lightroom is efficient at optimizing photos. But for the little things you can get by hand, for example cropping an image with an image other than the one the photo is taken with is as easy as LR5.

What It Does: The Filters tool is a feature that lets you layer different techniques and effects to align or alter an image in specific ways. Photographers and artists use Filters to simply apply filters to a photo or to combine layers to create more. The Filters tool is also used in some graphic design programs - It would be similar to Adobe Illustrator's Layers, except the Filters tool is permanent until you change them and multiple Filters can be applied to a single image.
